Assignments: Drafting parts of or entire district court and appellate briefs; researching discrete issues oflaw, assisting in the development of discovery, and participating in witness interviews, preparation of trial, and trial itself. Interns are also encouraged to attend court hearings, attorney conferences, trials and appellate arguments before the Ninth Circuit. In addition, interns are exposed to some of the various law enforcement agencies with which the office works through tours and other activities. Second-year students who have successfully completed their school classes in Criminal Law, Evidence and Criminal Procedure are eligible to try petty offense cases in federal court before a federal magistrate judge. These trials pertain to various types of minor criminal offenses, and include opening statements, direct and cross-examination, and closing arguments. The trials are prosecuted solely by student interns under the close supervision of an Assistant United States Attorney.
